Explicitly illustrated in the pie chart is a survey about students' traveling purposes in a certain college. As we can see from the graph, 37% of the students travel for the purpose of appreciating sceneries, and 33% relieving pressure while students who travel to cultivate the spirit of independence and make friends account for 6% and 9% respectively.

With students' living standards raised dramatically, there is no reason to make a fuss about this trend, and it is an easy task for me to list some more reasons. To begin with, according to Maslow's hierarchy of needs, after students' basic needs like the physiological needs and the safety and security needs have been met, they begin to look for a life of comfort and enjoyment. What's more, we can largely ascribe this phenomenon to increasingly fierce competition in job market and growing pressure in their study, which lead to many students trying to relieve their pressure through travelling. Last but not least, students' pursuit of broadening horizons is also a factor that must be pointed out.

From what I have discussed above, we can safely draw the conclusion that the phenomenon presented in the graph is understandable. In my humble opinion, college students should travel more, since "Man who travels far knows more."
