

In recent years, it is a truth universally acknowledged that teenagers in mounting numbers start to discuss about whether to attend a vocational college or a university in our highly modernized and industrialized society. As for me, I am in favor of the former idea.

So conspicuous are the impacts of attending a vocational college that I would like to explore the following aspects. To begin with, by no means can we deny that the skills or techniques learnt from vocational colleges serve as a critical role in the process of job-hunting. According to a recent study conducted by CCTV, every 7 out of 10 HR managers responding to the questionnaire claimed that they preferred to hire employees with specific skills. Moreover, the rapid growth of the number of students who have received vocational training makes it possible to promote the development of the industry, the importance of which shall never be neglected.

Teenagers, in conclusion, are supposed to make a wise choice about their future depending on their own hobbies, merits and ideas. Only when the advice above is literally put into effect can they expect to become better selves in the foreseeable future.
