In the current context, there has been a heated discussion about the use of translation apps, especially among students in campus. Meanwhile, it has long been known that "There is no garden without its weeds.", and these translation apps are no exception, which have both merits and demerits.

For one thing, some insist that their ever-strengthened function and increasingly improved accuracy can provide a good deal of assistance for the users to accomplish their daily study or work, which means that they can easily enhance their study or work efficiency. For another thing, others believe that the overuse of these apps may mislead some students and make them rely on their electronic devices excessively, ignoring the fact that they should also cultivate their independent ability of thinking and studying.

All in all, the value of the ability to study autonomously can never be overemphasized. Thus, we should take good advantage of these modern electronic devices, avoiding over dependence. Only by doing so, can we have a promising future.
