The Use of Translation Apps

The use of translation apps is becoming increasingly popular. For the past several years, it seems that there has been a general consensus among on-campus students on how to pick up a foreign language promptly and efficiently: turn to a translation app rather than look it up in the dictionary.

Several shaping factor, as far as I am concerned, would be singled out for this trend as follows. The _reason for their preference is that_ translation apps make it likely for college students to make better sense of the words and expressions, or even the whole passage they are unfamiliar with in quite a short period, which saves them a great deal of time and effort. However, an old saying has it that every sword has two edges and the use of translation apps is no exception. It cannot be denied that too much time spent on translation apps on your cellphone or the computer may pose a serious threat to your physical health such as eyesight.

As I see it, the importance of the proper use of translation apps cannot be underrated, and possible ways should also be figured out to cope with the problems that would arise. Only in this way can we learn more effectively and rewardingly.
