In today's hectic, fast-paced life, an increasing number of people are inclined to regard money as their ultimate goals. Hardly do they realize the pivotal role a rich inner world plays in modern society.

Reasons for such phenomenon are self-evident. First and foremost, under the mounting pressures caused by works and loans, people, especially young generations, are compelled to give priority to subsistence problems, as a result of which they might be empty-minded to a certain extent. In view of this point, it is suggested that individuals should pour more attention to and enrich their spiritual world. Through reading various books and visiting exhibitions, individuals could detach themselves from real life temporarily so that they can seek to touch the essence of their own world. Otherwise, they would definitely be reduced to being mechanistic money-spinners. On the other hand, the fact that some people are content with where they are also accounts for the sense of mind emptiness. Hence, it would be advisable for them to set one goal after another. Only by doing so can they become rich both economically and spiritually.

To drive my opinions home, the wealth of mind is of far-reaching significance and is closely bound up with all of us. We ought to enrich our inner world in daily life.
